I bring 25 years in insurance and finance—the kind of operational depth that bridges CFO office needs, regulatory constraints, and actual delivery. I've spent my entire career solving problems at that intersection: closing redesigns, PMO governance, transformation programs where technical rigor meets business reality.

What I do well: I can walk into complexity, separate signal from noise, align Finance/Actuariat/IT/Risk around a real plan, and then hold the line on execution. I've led this for Generali, Axa, and others—not as a theorist, but as someone who understands both the spreadsheet and the regulatory filing.

Two concrete examples. I restructured a closing cycle for a major French insurer—28 days down to 12, reduced manual controls by 60%, built the process framework that stuck after I left. More recently, I designed and managed a full finance transformation programme for a holding company: new operating model, process standardization, control architecture. Both started as chaos. Both shipped on time.

The honest gap: I'm structured as a freelance consultant. That's been deliberate—it gives me focus and flexibility. But I'm genuinely open to embedded roles where the work justifies it: full transformation mandates, CFO office positions, or programmes where continuity and accountability matter enough to make that shift.

I'm efficient in conversation. Book a 30-minute call if you see a fit—I'll either know quickly whether I can add real value or tell you so directly.
