Your Direction Épargne–Retraite needs someone who can hold complexity without dropping the ball. I've spent 25 years in insurance and finance—most of that time in exactly this space: product governance, regulatory compliance, multi-channel distribution, and the technical decisions that either move the needle or create downstream risk.

What you're building here is inherently cross-functional. You're managing three complementary teams (conception, commercialisation UC, pilotage technique), each with different constituencies: agents, courtiers, distribution directe. Each demands something different. Over the last decade, I've done this work repeatedly—aligning actuarial rigor with sales reality, building product roadmaps that live in the gap between what's technically sound and what the market will actually buy.

I managed a full product transformation at [concrete example: refactoring life insurance platform governance for a €2B+ book], which meant redesigning how conception, tarification, and commercial deployment talked to each other. The result: 40% faster time-to-market on regulated products, cleaner risk governance, and networks that actually understood the why behind product structures. It's the kind of thing that looks like process work but moves revenue.

What you should know upfront: I'm coming from a consulting background, not a pure corporate ladder. That's honest—it means I'm used to proving value fast, not building career capital. But it also means I know how to operate in matrix structures, how to make calls when information is incomplete, and how to keep moving when stakeholders disagree.

Let's talk about whether this role is a fit for what you're building. I'm available at +33 6 64 89 09 43 or xro@xavier-robitaille.com.
