I bring 25 years of finance and insurance expertise—the exact domain where Irly wins with complex clients. My edge: I've spent two decades at the intersection of business transformation and technical delivery, which is precisely where this role sits.

Over the last five years, I've led major programs as an interim senior manager and independent consultant. Most relevant: a complete finance operating model redesign for a tier-1 insurer—rebuilt processes, designed controls frameworks, delivered regulatory reporting overhauls, and managed cross-functional teams across Finance, Actuariat, and IT. That's the DNA of what you're after: strategy + execution + stakeholder alignment under pressure.

I know the Financial Services playbook cold. I've navigated Solvency II, IFRS 17, and cloud migration programs. I understand where the real complexity lives—not in the tech jargon, but in how you reconcile business requirements, regulatory constraints, and delivery timelines when no two stakeholders read from the same page.

The honest bit: I've worked primarily as a freelancer and interim manager, not in a traditional consulting firm structure. That's actually my strength for this role. I know how to operate lean, own outcomes end-to-end, and build lasting client relationships because I've had to. But if Irly wants someone embedded in firm culture, with the collaborative rhythm of team-based delivery, that's a genuine transition for me—one I'm ready for with the right opportunity.

I'm fluent in English and French, solid with Power BI and data analysis tools, and I run clean project governance—Agile, Kanban, whatever your teams use.

Let's talk about how I can help Irly scale its Financial Services practice.
