I bring 25 years of finance and insurance expertise directly into the transformation work Resultance does in the financial services sector. My career has been built on exactly what your Senior Consultant role requires: diagnosing operational complexity, designing sustainable solutions, and navigating regulatory constraints while moving stakeholders toward change.

Over the past five years, I've led transformation initiatives that sit at the intersection of your core mandate. At a major European asset manager, I redesigned the fund administration operating model across middle and back office—reducing process cycle times by 35% while embedding new UCITS and AIFMD compliance controls into daily workflows. That project meant understanding fund valuation, reconciliation, and reporting end-to-end, then translating regulatory requirements into operational reality. I've done similar work in regulatory reporting transformation (Solvency II environments) and system-driven process optimization where the business case hinged on both cost reduction and risk mitigation.

What matters here: I don't just analyze processes. I understand how compliance, risk, and operations actually work together. I've built governance frameworks, supported stakeholder alignment through real change management, and delivered on aggressive timelines. I'm comfortable moving between technical depth (Luxembourg regulatory frameworks, fund distribution models, middle-office workflows) and board-level clarity about what transformation actually costs and delivers.

The main honest constraint: I've worked primarily as a consultant and interim operations executive, not in a traditional consulting firm structure. That's an asset for client-side problem-solving and delivery discipline, but if your culture requires a specific consulting methodology or firm background, that's worth discussing early.

I'm interested in how Resultance structures senior consultant roles around sector expertise and regulatory depth. I'd welcome a conversation about how my background in financial services transformation could contribute to your client work in Luxembourg and beyond.
