

Dear PwC Ireland Hiring Team,

I'm writing to express my interest in the Customer and Business Transformation Senior Manager role in Dublin. After 25 years working exclusively in insurance and financial services transformation, I recognize exactly what this role demands—and where I can add value.

My career has centred on the operating model and process redesign work you're looking for. I've spent the last decade leading end-to-end transformation programmes across underwriting, claims, and policy administration for major insurers. More recently, I've embedded myself in finance operations, regulatory reporting, and organizational change—the unglamorous work that determines whether digital transformation actually sticks. I understand the friction points: the claims operation that resists process change, the underwriting team split between legacy and new systems, the actuarial function that hasn't been consulted, the IT team working to a different timeline. I know how to navigate that.

Two examples. I redesigned the PMO and governance structure for a mid-sized insurer's complete operating model overhaul, cutting delivery cycle time by 35% and aligning five fractious business units around shared metrics. Later, I led the AMOA work on a claims transformation programme—translating regulatory requirements and data analytics into practical process design—while managing the CFO's reporting and control concerns in parallel. Both required exactly what your job description emphasizes: structured problem-solving, lean methodology, and the ability to partner with senior client executives who care about outcomes, not consulting theatre.

The candid part: I've operated as an independent consultant for the last three years, which means I'm built for flexibility and results. A full-time, hybrid role in Dublin represents a shift toward embedded leadership and team-building—something I'm actively pursuing because it aligns with where I want to be in this phase of my career.

I'd welcome a conversation about how my experience translates to PwC's client base and your team's priorities.

Best regards,
Xavier Robitaille
