As a senior consultant with 25 years in finance and insurance transformation, I've spent the last decade doing exactly what SimCorp needs: translating complex regulatory and operational requirements into successful software implementations. I understand the space between what clients think they need and what actually works operationally.

I've led full-cycle implementations in accounting, reporting, and operations for major financial institutions—the exact environment where ABOR expertise matters most. On a recent three-year mandate at a top-tier insurance group, I owned the delivery of their complete financial close redesign across 12 entities, working as the technical-business bridge between their CFO office and their systems team. The project stayed on track, hit regulatory deadlines, and reduced month-end cycle time by 40%. That's the kind of sparring partnership your clients need: someone who speaks both finance architecture and implementation discipline.

I also bring what your values actually require—the ability to hold complexity without oversimplifying it, to listen to clients without losing sight of what's realistic, and to escalate honestly when scope or execution needs course-correcting. Those aren't soft skills; they're what keeps projects moving when the hard parts show up.

One thing to flag: I've worked as an independent consultant for the last five years, so this is a transition back into a structured organization. That said, my track record is built on delivering outcomes, not on finding comfort—and I'm genuinely interested in the collaborative environment you're describing, especially the focus on skills development.

I'm ready to talk through how my experience translates to your team's needs.
