Re : Principal Consultant – Sovereign Financial Market Infrastructure & Strategic Advisory

Advising governments and central banks on the design of post-trade infrastructure requires more than strategic framing. It requires someone who has sat inside the accounting, regulatory and operational plumbing of these institutions and knows where the real constraints sit. That's the gap BLEUMOTION seems to be filling with practitioners rather than generalist advisors.

My work has consistently placed me at that intersection of regulatory rigor and execution. At CNP Assurances, I rebuilt investment accounting production under Solvency II constraints, covering 350 billion euros in assets, delivered in 18 months and on time, working directly with actuarial, risk and IT to align a fragmented operating model. I've also led SimCorp Dimension and Clearwater Analytics implementations end to end, from design through cutover, where the hard part was never the system itself but getting finance, operations and IT to agree on a single target model before go-live. That kind of institutional alignment, translated into Board-level reporting and decision papers, is exactly the muscle this role asks for.

I don't have direct exposure to central securities depositories or exchange governance structures. My infrastructure experience sits on the investment accounting and asset servicing side of financial institutions, not inside a CSD or CCP itself.

Remote and hybrid delivery is standard practice for me. At Clearwater, I ran distributed workstreams across time zones without friction, so international travel and remote client engagement wouldn't require any adjustment. Worth a call to see where the fit is closest.
