Re : Program Project Manager

Governing a major Investment Management transformation while a third-party partner owns the technical build is a coordination problem before it's a delivery problem: RAID logs, steering committee reporting and vendor alignment all have to hold together without anyone owning the platform build directly. That's the part of programme management I've spent most of my career doing in regulated financial services.

At CNP Assurances, I rebuilt investment accounting production under Solvency II constraints across 350 billion euros in assets, coordinating actuarial, IT and operations teams to hit an 18-month deadline with no slippage. The governance discipline required there, RAID tracking, executive reporting, dependency management across workstreams, is the same muscle this role needs. I've also led SimCorp Dimension and Clearwater Analytics implementations end to end, working directly with implementation partners as the coordination point between vendor delivery and business requirements, which maps closely to the operating-model and vendor-management scope here. Investment operations and portfolio accounting have been my core subject matter for most of that time, not an adjacent skill I'm building toward.

Hybrid working is standard practice for me. My most recent engagement at Clearwater ran on that basis, and I'm comfortable running governance and stakeholder reporting remotely without losing rigor.

I don't have direct FactSet experience, though I've worked with comparable investment performance platforms in similar governance contexts.

Happy to walk through the CNP programme in more detail on a call.
