Dear Hiring Manager,

I'm applying for the Claims Transformation Manager role at Allianz Ireland because my 25 years in insurance transformation directly address what you need: someone who can align competing business stakeholders around a product vision while anchoring decisions to delivery reality.

I've spent the last decade running similar programs—defining product objectives, managing tactical budgets, and reshaping service journeys across claims operations. Most recently, I led a claims process redesign for a European insurer where I partnered product, operations, and finance to move from manual triage to a self-serve model. The result: 35% reduction in handling time, $2.8M annual savings, and a clear metrics framework that tracked both business value and customer experience. I prepared the business case, secured stakeholder buy-in across seven departments, and stayed embedded through delivery to keep vision and execution aligned.

What I bring: I'm fluent in translating between business strategy and technical capability. I don't create plans that live in PowerPoint. I work at the intersection of what's strategically right, operationally feasible, and financially viable—which is where transformation actually happens. I've managed similar budgets, owned success metrics, and pushed back on timelines when reality didn't match ambition.

One honest note: I'm currently independent. If Allianz prefers someone transitioning into a permanent role, that's fair. But if you value someone who's built a reputation on execution discipline, stakeholder clarity, and results over process, I'm ready to move forward.

I'm based in Paris and available to visit Dublin for interviews. Happy to walk through specific examples of how I'd approach your claims transformation roadmap.

Yours sincerely,

Xavier Robitaille
