I bring 25 years of insurance and finance experience directly aligned with what Samsara demands: complex program delivery across fractured stakeholder groups, operational process redesign, and governance discipline under regulatory pressure.

As a senior consultant, I've led comparable transformations. At Generali, I redesigned the entire finance operating model across 12 countries—reprioritizing 40+ projects, aligning actuarial and IT roadmaps, and delivering a €2.4M annual savings target on time. At AXA (client work), I managed the CFO office PMO, building governance frameworks that let scattered teams move as one. Both taught me what makes transformation stick: clear alignment, honest risk management, and stakeholders who actually believe in the outcome.

The Samsara program sits exactly here—strategic ambition meets operational reality. I excel at translating CLP's growth strategy into executable workstreams, mapping the messier stakeholder dynamics (product, operations, finance, risk), and building the reporting discipline that keeps senior leadership grounded in what's working and what's not. I've done this in 8-figure programs where scope creep and misaligned priorities kill outcomes. I don't let that happen.

One honest thing: I've worked primarily as a freelance consultant rather than employed. It's given me deep expertise and flexibility, but I understand you may prefer embedded stability for a role of this complexity. That said, I'm actively exploring permanent positions where the work justifies the commitment, and CLP's mandate makes real sense to me.

I'd welcome a conversation about how I've structured similar programs and what I see as the real risks in the CLP playbook.
