I bring 25 years of insurance and finance experience—not as a newcomer to transformation, but as someone who's delivered it operationally. I've spent the last decade leading complex finance redesigns in regulated environments where process, technology, and stakeholder alignment all had to work together or the whole thing fell apart.

What matters for this role: I understand how P2P, O2C, and R2R interconnect. I've designed target operating models for insurance groups navigating Solvency II compliance while simultaneously overhauling their closing process. I've managed concurrent workstreams—some moving fast, others constrained by regulatory gates—and kept quality consistent across all of them. I work at CFO office level because I speak the language of both finance and operations, and I don't mistake complexity for confusion.

Two concrete examples. At a major French insurer, I took ownership of a €50m procurement transformation spanning three legal entities and 18 months. Rebuilt the entire P2P function, embedded controls that stuck, and delivered €4m in sustainable savings. Second: rebuilt the consolidation and reporting framework for an insurance group post-acquisition—rewired how five finance teams fed data upstream, redesigned the month-end close from 15 days to 8, and trained teams so the improvement held without me. Both taught me that transformation only lands when you manage the technical work and the people doing it.

I should be direct about one thing: I've worked as an independent consultant and interim manager for the past several years. I build accountability into every engagement, but I'm not embedded in a large firm's day-to-day culture. This role asks for someone who can contribute to practice development and grow junior teams—which I can do, but it's a shift from how I've been operating. That's worth a conversation.

I'd welcome the chance to discuss how my track record on delivery translates to leadership of this calibre.
