I bring 25 years of finance and insurance expertise directly into regulatory reporting and transformation work—exactly what EY's Finance competency needs.

My last three years as interim Finance Manager across two major insurers taught me how to navigate complex regulatory landscapes while driving actual change. At one insurer, I redesigned the regulatory reporting framework across five compliance domains, cutting processing time by 35% and reducing control exceptions from 62 to 8 within six months. At another, I led the finance operating model rebuild post-acquisition, aligning CFO office, actuarial, and operations teams through a 200+ control-point remediation programme. Both roles required the same skills your posting emphasizes: translating regulatory complexity into executable business change, managing cross-functional stakeholder alignment, and delivering results under tight compliance deadlines.

What separates my profile: I've sat in the CFO office long enough to understand what transformation actually costs operationally, not just theoretically. I speak both the technical language (Solvency II, IFRS 17, risk data governance) and the delivery language (PMO, process design, governance gates). I know where finance teams typically get stuck during transformation and how to unstick them.

The honest gap: I've worked as an independent consultant and interim leader for five years. You're looking for permanent staff. If EY values someone who's delivered results in high-stakes regulatory environments and can hit the ground running in Dublin without a long ramp-up period, that trade-off works for both of us.

I'm ready to discuss how my background fits your current client work and what the role actually demands. Let's talk this week.
