I'm drawn to this PMO Lead role because Bloomberg's Buy-Side implementation programs sit exactly where I add the most value: complex delivery spanning multiple stakeholders, regulatory context, and the need to translate business intent into executable scope.

My background is 25 years deep in finance and insurance transformation—not generic PMO work, but programmes where technical feasibility, regulatory constraints, and organisational alignment collide. I've led multi-year platform implementations across portfolio analytics, risk systems, and regulatory reporting. The pattern is consistent: I own governance and delivery coordination across internal teams, external vendors, and C-suite stakeholders when clarity and discipline matter most.

Two concrete examples. At a major French insurance group, I scoped and delivered a complete actuarial and reporting platform migration—€8M budget, 18-month timeline, three business units, four vendors, two regulators watching. My role: translate CFO and Chief Actuary requirements into technical roadmap, manage dependencies between product teams and legacy system decommissioning, surface risks early in steering committees. The programme went live on time; the client extended my mandate to lead BAU handover because stakeholder alignment held.

More recently, I managed programme governance for a €30M insurance-to-cloud transformation: scoped the build, designed handoff protocols between implementation leads and product teams, maintained control when scope drifted. The work sits close to what you're describing—translating business objectives into clear scope and executable plans, connecting experts across Bloomberg, clients, and vendors.

I'm currently independent (Expert Zone Advisory), which means I move fast and think like an owner. The trade-off is I'm used to autonomy and tend to work best where governance and decision-making are crisp. Bloomberg's scale and structure are a fit, not a constraint.

I'm ready to move to this. Let's talk about how you approach vendor ecosystems and pre-sales scoping with clients who've never run Buy-Side implementations before.
