

Dear Wavestone Team,

I'm writing to explore the Senior Consultant Insurance Operations role in Germany. After 25 years in insurance and finance—entirely hands-on in delivery, not academia—I recognize exactly what this position demands: someone who bridges business process optimization, technical requirements documentation, and stakeholder alignment under real deadline pressure.

My value here is specific. I've spent the last decade in interim and consulting roles redesigning insurance operating models where portfolio management and claims operations intersect. Most recently, I led the PMO and process redesign for a mid-market insurer's portfolio management system migration—25+ stakeholders across underwriting, finance, and operations. The work involved mapping current-state processes, defining technical requirements for the new system, managing integration architecture decisions, and running adoption workshops. Result: 18-month delivery on time, zero critical defects in year-one production.

Before that, I designed and embedded financial controls and automated reporting flows for insurers managing regulatory obligations across multiple geographies—the kind of work that teaches you fast how process discipline either enables or breaks digital transformation.

What I bring is not consultant polish. It's the ability to translate between actuarial and IT language, spot where business requirements are actually incomplete, push back on timelines when they're unrealistic, and move teams past analysis paralysis into execution. I'm comfortable leading small workstreams and talking to C-suite equally with operations teams.

The honest gap: I've been independent and interim for three years. This role appears structured as potential permanent placement. I'm genuinely open to the right role—Germany, the insurance focus, and Wavestone's operating model all fit my criteria. But I want to be clear about that shift upfront rather than discover misalignment later.

I'm available to discuss how my experience maps to your client portfolio and team needs. You can reach me at +33 6 64 89 09 43 or xro@xavier-robitaille.com.
