Dear AMMA Leadership,

I'm writing because the Head of Transformation role fits a specific gap in my track record: I've spent 25 years in insurance and finance transformation, but I've done it mostly as an interim consultant. This role offers what I've been looking for—the chance to anchor strategy into sustained organizational change at a company built on a genuinely different model.

Your challenge is real. AMMA has 64,000 members and a cooperative structure that outsiders can't simply reorganize. You need someone who understands both the technical complexity of insurance operations and how to move people. I've done this before. At a €2B+ mutual insurer, I led the PMO for a three-year operating model redesign—reconciling actuarial requirements, regulatory reporting, and a fragmented IT landscape while keeping 400+ staff aligned. The result: 18% cost reduction and a modernized platform that lasted. I didn't come in with a template. I mapped dependencies, killed dead weight, and reported honestly to the CEO every two weeks about what was working and what wasn't.

What's different now: I'm not looking for another short-term mandate. AMMA's mission—protecting healthcare workers rather than extracting profit—is the kind of thing that matters. And your scale (complex but not unwieldy) is where real transformation actually sticks.

One honest point: I've been freelance by choice for seven years. Moving to a CDI is a real shift. But it's the right shift for the right role.

I'm in Brussels regularly and available to discuss how I'd approach your first 100 days. You can reach me at xro@xavier-robitaille.com or on Calendly.

Best regards,

Xavier Robitaille
