I bring 25 years of insurance and finance transformation experience—exactly the operational rigor and stakeholder alignment this role demands. My track record is driving complex product and process redesigns where business clarity, technical feasibility, and execution discipline have to converge.

What makes me relevant: I've spent the last decade designing and delivering transformation programmes in insurance operating models. I've worked across Claims, Finance, and Risk—meaning I speak the language of both your business stakeholders and your product teams. I've led the alignment work you're describing: establishing shared product vision across competing priorities, building business cases tied to actual value metrics, and translating strategic intent into workable tactical roadmaps.

One concrete example: I recently redesigned a claims operating model for a major insurer, which involved mapping the current journey, defining self-serve adoption targets, and building a phased delivery plan across three workstreams. The result was a clear product backlog, identified platform harmonization opportunities, and measurable KPIs tied to customer experience and cost. That's the kind of structured thinking and cross-functional ownership I'd bring to Claims Transformation at Allianz.

I'm currently independent, which means I work on defined scopes and deliver with urgency. A 12-month maternity contract is exactly the kind of structured, time-bound engagement where I perform well. The Dublin location and hybrid model work for me.

My main gap: I come from consulting and delivery roles, not formal product management titles—but my work has consistently sat at that intersection of business strategy, product definition, and operational delivery.

I'm ready to discuss how my experience translates to your transformation priorities.
