As a transformation consultant with 25 years in insurance, I bring exactly what this role needs: the ability to align fragmented stakeholder groups around a clear product vision while delivering measurable outcomes under pressure.

I've spent the last decade sitting at the intersection of business strategy, product delivery, and operational reality—the exact position a Claims Transformation Manager occupies. My recent work includes redesigning end-to-end claims processes for a mid-size insurer, where I coordinated across Finance, Operations, and IT to establish a self-serve-first model that reduced first-contact resolution time by 34% and improved NPS by 12 points. I've also led the product vision alignment work for a regulatory reporting transformation programme, managing competing priorities across CFO office, Actuariat, and Compliance to create a single source of truth for 15+ business units.

What sets me apart: I don't just translate between business and product. I shape the business case itself—defining success metrics that matter, owning the budget alignment, and ensuring every priority traces back to strategy. I'm comfortable saying no to stakeholders when the data doesn't support a direction, and I get respect for that clarity.

The honest gap: I've been independent for the last five years. This maternity contract offers something I'm actively looking for—a structured role, a defined mission, and the chance to embed in a culture (Allianz's Great Place to Work credential matters). Twelve months is the right timeline for me to make a real impact on your claims transformation without overcommitting.

I'm based in France but prepared for Dublin, hybrid-friendly, and ready to start as soon as you need.

Let's talk about what "beating the best" looks like for your claims product.
